

Training in using protocols

Structured conversations to talk about student work and teacher work.

A 5-day workshop

Background

For the past 10 years the ANSN has been exploring the relationship between teacher work and student work. This has been done with groups of teachers from every phase of schooling and every state and territory. It is based on the premise that if teachers and students produce learning together, the evidence of that learning can be found in the students work. It can be challenging to work with colleagues to give and get feedback on each others work. Protocols help us structure our conversations. They can be used to help us learn from each other by having productive conversations and they can help us learn from the students by providing us with structured ways to look at student work.

In this training you will...

- Explore a number of protocols and their uses.
- Identify and practice ways to engage in conversations about teachers' work.
- Identify and practice ways to have structured conversations about students' work.
- Think about, and plan for using protocols in your school.
- Reflect and practice ways to train others in using protocols

On completion of the course you can...

Apply to become an accredited user of the protocols for the Australian National Schools Network (ANSN).

Course Structure:

Typically offered as an introductory 2-day workshop followed later by a 3-day workshop but this can be negotiated to be arranged differently to suit a group.

Who is it for?

Teachers, school leaders and central and district consultants.
